Functional Polymers by Post Polymerization Modification

In modern polymer science a variety of polymerization methods for the direct synthesis of polymers bearing functional groups are known. However, there is still a large number of functional groups that may either completely prevent polymerization or lead to side reactions.

Kemal Arda Gunay, Patrick Theato, and Harm-Anton Klok 1.1 Introduction The history of post-polymerization modification, also known as polymer analogous modification, is arguably as long as the history of polymer science. As early as 1840, Hancock and Ludersdorf independently reported the transformation of natural rubber into a tough and elastic material on treatment with sulfur [1]. In

Post-polymerization modification, also known as polymer-analogous modification, is an alternative approach to overcome these limitations. It is based on the polymerization of monomers with functional groups that are inert towards the polymerization conditions but allow a quantitative conversion in a subsequent reaction step yielding a broad range of other functional groups. Thus, diverse

Synthesis of Functional Polymers by Post Polymerization

Post polymerization modification is based on the direct polymerization or copolymerization of monomers bearing chemoselective handles that are inert towards the polymerization conditions but can be quantitatively converted in a subsequent step into a broad range of other functional groups.
